Some homes are designed to impose themselves on their surroundings. This one does exactly the opposite. Conceived as a piece of architecture integrated into the hillside, the residence extends horizontally through mature vegetation, stone, concrete and expansive planes of glass, allowing the landscape to become a permanent part of the interiors. The architecture is deliberately serene. Clean lines, flat roofs and a natural material palette create a contemporary aesthetic free from excess. Inside, wood brings warmth to a neutral composition of stone and soft tones, while floor-to-ceiling windows open the principal living spaces towards the mountains and the Mediterranean. The home is arran...
